den rays have risen higher above the horizon and shed more richly their hight upon human thought and action.

And here behold the finni consequence, the crowning glory of the alliance of America and France in the War of Independence! Behold the realization of the fondest dreams of our Lafayette! In the world's arana az the mighty champions of humanity's new age there stand side by side, as once they stood at Yorktown, America and France—hoth republics today, both republics temorrow—republics by decree of what among men is the final absolute arbiter of the political dust'- absolute arbiter of the political desti-nies of nations, the will of the people. To America and France is given the noble mission to be to the world the exemplars of civil and political liberty. exemplars of civil and political liberty. That they be true to their mission must be the prayer of all friends of liberty of all friends of liberty of all friends of humanity. The better to insure the possession of liberty they have taken to themselves the his-best form of democracy—they have made themselves republies. They must show that such form of liberty is capable of enduring amid all the writhings and passions of humanity, and that beneath it in harmony with its promises there are to be found liberty's best and sweetest blessings. Do as our republics may, they will not reach the ideal which they have put before themselves; while men are the representatives and agents of an ideal, there will necessarily be in the realization of it the shortcomings of men; there will be from time to time the inconsistencies and the contradictions which the limitations of the human and the and the contradictions which the limitations of the human mind and the play of human interests bring into the practical life of man. But, despite all this, and indeed, because of this all, must the world's great republics never reiax in loyal and strenuous efforts to be in their whole national life the embe in their whole national life the embodiment of liberty as far as this beauteous spirit of the heavens can find embodiment upon earth. To them is assigned the task of proving that the fullest democracy guarantees to a people, together with liberty, the security of law and order, and the growth and prosperity of the nation—that the fullest democracy ever true to its name and profession, means for the individual man and citizen the actual and assured enjoyment of the personal rights which he inherits from nature and nawhich he i

And who more fittingly than Lafeyette could stand forth before the world as the representative of the principles of civil and political liberty for which he and Washington fought? The passion of his soul, the inspiration of all his thoughts and acts, was liberty; liberty drew him to America, liberty all his thoughts and acts, was liberty; liberty drew him to America; liberty put words of fire upon his lips in the states—general liberty led him to the prison of Olmutz. He understood—no one ever understood better—what true liberty is, and as he understood it, so he loved it and defended it unto death. Liberty he Twed as the fulness of enjoyment of one's own natural rights with proper regard to the natural rights of others, the fullest play of one's own powers of mind and heart consistent with public welfare and public order. He stood the strenuous defender of the rights of man and the clitzen which absolutism would fain destroy, and champloned them he hated of chizenship, in the name of conscience, he champloned them beneath the frown of the potential and in defiance of bribe and threat. He stood the strenuous defender of law and order which are the conditions of liberty and which anarchy would fain subvert. When the strengtle in France for liberty degenerated into mad riot he cast aside the headership which he had taken in the name of liberty, and which he could have refreshments were served and dancing indulged in.
